The Dragon Slayer

Once upon a time, fierce dragons lived in a castle faraway. The villagers became scared, so they called in an army. When the dragons saw the army, they braced themselves for a fight. They blew fire and ice at the army. The army tried with all of their might to defeat the dragons but the fire and ice were simply too strong. They fired cannon balls at the dragons, but the ice blown by the dragons froze the cannon balls. The princess of the village happened to be close to the castle, so a dragon swooped down and used its big claws to pick up the princess and brought her into the castle.

The king sent David, the strongest warrior, to rescue the princess. David had adopted a baby dragon named Artix, and they were good friends. They began their adventure by defeating a man named Evil Andrew. After they won the hard battle, Artix grew into a really big, bright, and yellow dragon. He turned into an electric dragon! Nobody knew how to ride an electric dragon, but since David and Artix were such good friends, Artix let David ride on his back and they flew to the evil dragons' lair.

In the castle, they were surrounded by a swarm of dragons. The dragons used fire, ice and other weapons to fight Artix and David, but they could not win. They fought until everybody was exhausted. Then Artix said to the dragons, "Why can't we make peace? I know we can live peacefully together." Other dragons agreed. They gave the princess back to David.

When they came back, everyone cheered. David told the king everything. The king was very happy. The villagers and dragons lived in peace happily ever after.
